

Hello, I am Professor Pman from Penn State University and since I was a wee lad I had always seen attacks of the human race take place in public restrooms. One of the biggest, most threatening of which is seeing men walk away without a single ounce of water hit their grubby hands. And this occurrence isn't just once in a while, my odds before my research would be 2/50 men would wash their hands. And this got me thinking about how much more clean the opposite gender is...

Now, a study was done at Michigan State University which had researchers hang around restrooms to collect data on how many people would wash their hands. Turns out only 5% of 3,749 people washed their hands correctly. And to break it down 50% of men washed without soap compared to 78% of women; and to break it down more 15% of men didn't even wash their hands along with 7% of women. Now considering half of the 3,749 people were male and taking this 15% to the whole United states we get 24,141,272 male citizens out of 161M who don't wash their hands. Granted though this is an extremely rough estimate from my experience at football games this number doesn't seem too far off.

Another study conducted by Kelly R. Moran and Sara Y. Del Valle looked at the statistics from countries including but not limited to the United States, Britain, and India. This study was different from the last though because what Kelly and Sara were trying to find was which gender would practice better handwashing techniques during a flu season or outbreak. The results found that women were more than 50% more likely to practice handwashing techniques. There is a gender gap; why there is a gender gap hasn't been studied. I'm going to try and hypothesize on why men are ok with having pee hands. Rarely do I find guys built like me not wash their hands. It's usually macho men or beer-bellied dads. They're just built different. germs and have no way of affecting them because they're just so masculine; which is weird since men are shown to die younger than women.

I see men not washing their hands as another case of toxic masculinity, this being actually toxic. Hygiene is looked at as a feminine trait among males. I feel like most men would agree with me that even though we agree it shouldn't be looked at as a feminine trait, it still is. And the males who believe it is a feminine trait are usually the same ones who are insecure about how much of a man they are. But this doesn't make sense when we take into account the fact that more men would wash their hands if more people were in the bathroom according to the first study I covered. In the second study though we might have a lead. Men were found to more likely wash their hands when being told, "soap it off or eat it later". This leads me to believe that it is a societal thing rather it's just men are more likely to focus on the present than the future.

We think everything's fine and we don't pay attention to the problem, that our hands are dirty; that my hands were dirty. I was caught up thinking we, me and my immune system were fine. So I didn't have to wash my hands and then with my unbelievably dense mind I ate my food and over 3 weeks, I saw myself and my immune system deteriorate. I still hadn't thought of what I had done until I was dead, of course, it was too late. I watched over my dead body and pondered the question, to pee or not to pee. If I hadn't peed, I wouldn't have to wash my hands but I would still die of not peeing. So you have to pee and in turn, wash your hands. You have to wash your hands or else you 'll end up like me. Professor Pman from Penn State University, dead because I didn't watch Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs and never learned the importance of washing your hands and face.

The important lesson to take away from this is to never trust your uncle Randy who told you washing your hands was a myth created by the Russian government to plant chips in our heads.

Wash your hands for 30 seconds with soap and water and make sure to get under your nails.
